

There are no translations available.

Abstract Although there has been a proliferation of interest in sustainable business practice, recent research has identified concerns with the relative neglect of the social versus environmental aspects of sustainability. It is argued here that due to its reliance on internally held, concrete and intrinsically motivated forms of responsiveness, as well as its ability to be authentically social versus parochial in nature, that the ethical construct of “embodied care” (Hamington, Embodied Care: Jane Addams, Maurice Merleau-Ponty, and Feminist Ethics, 2004) has particular relevance as one path through which responsiveness to the human aspects of sustainable business practice might occur. Consideration is given to care as both an individual and organizational level construct. Business case examples are offered and directions for future research described.

- Content Type Journal Article
- Pages 1-12
- DOI 10.1007/s10551-011-1059-7
- Authors
- Sheldene Simola, Business Administration Program, Trent University, 1600 West Bank Drive, Peterborough, ON K9J 7B8, Canada

- Journal Journal of Business Ethics
- Online ISSN 1573-0697
- Print ISSN 0167-4544

Read Full Article